

Revedia audit and agreement management

Assure compliance and protect your rights as content owner

Organizations that license content rely on distributor audits to ensure accurate revenue recognition. Negotiating, protecting, and enforcing audit rights involves a complex set of stakeholders and data sources. Managing the audit process without the proper tools in place can lead to inefficiencies and missed opportunities that put revenue and content rights at risk.

Challenge

Content licensors conducting audits face a number of hurdles in obtaining full transparency into distributor performance.

Limited visibility

Revenue reporting, frequency, and data fields vary by distributor, leading to inaccurate subscriber counts and payments.

Scattered data

Content owners without a central repository that contains searchable license agreement information and historical audit findings struggle to validate distributor revenue.

Invisible revenue leakage

Anomalies and errors often go undetected by content owners who are not equipped to thoroughly analyze distributor data.

Delayed collection

Locating and aggregating source data to validate and collect on audit findings across multiple systems delays content owners' ability to collect revenue.

Complex distribution

Monitoring compliance across multiple revenue streams, distributors and unique audit clauses can quickly become unmanageable without adequate tooling.

Audit rights management

Poorly negotiated agreements and lack of process to manage key dates such as claims windows result in expired audit rights and missed collection opportunities.

Historical records

Lack of access to past audit reports makes it difficult to track distributor performance and reporting over time, negatively impacting negotiations and distribution strategy.

ROI risk

Content owners invest significant resources in conducting audits with multiple manual workflow steps, without knowing if results will yield any financial benefit.

Solution

As an internationally recognized leader in media audits, SymphonyAI Media has developed innovative auditing software that revolutionizes licensing revenue.
